Senate Follows House Action, Which Gives Utilities Board Jurisdiction in District Only.

Despite the protest of the Public Utilities Commission, the Senate voted yesterday to let the Washington and Old Dominion Railway remain under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The company operates forty-four miles of track in Virginia and only a few miles of terminal track in the District. The company contended that its operation and finances should not be placed under the supervision of the local body, because it is an interstate carrier.

The Senate accepted the bill of Senator Martin favorably reported by the District Committee, placing only those physical properties in the District under the Public Utilities Commission. The House has already passed a similar measure.

G. W. HESS NAMED DIRECTOR.

Washington Man on Board of Florists and Horticulturalists.

The announcement in The Herald yesterday morning that George W. Hess was elected president of the Florists and Horticulturalists at their convention at Houston, Tex., was erroneous. Mr. Hess was elected on the board of directors of the Society of American Florists and Ornamental Horticulturalists.

Mr. Hess was chosen president of the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association.

HOROSCOPE.

"The stars incline, but do not compel."

Saturday, August 19, 1916.

Astrologers read this as an uncertain day. Although Venus and Mercury are in benefic aspect, Saturn and Uranus are adverse.

The planets are read as indicating an upheaval of public thought, which will not only reflect political conditions but extend to religious institutions.

Women have a fairly favorable rule today, but they should beware of false counsel.

There is a promising sign for actresses, singers and all who bespeak public favor.

Romance has a sinister direction while this configuration prevails. Elderly persons should be particularly cautious for they are supposed to be foolishly susceptible under this way.

All the stars appear to bear out the prognostication that there will be much sensational news for the periodicals to chronicle before the beginning of winter.

Again scandals in which the most prominent persons are involved are prophesied.

This is a particularly unlucky influence under which to buy or exchange property.

Mining has an evil forecast, which may indicate strikes or other labor difficulties.

Planetary conditions seem to foreshadow sensational occurrences in the West, which comes into a direction as giving promise of access of power in the political and financial world.

Statesmen from beyond the Mississippi River will gain fame in Congress.

Uranus gives warning of the appearance of false prophets and the launching of strange cults, which will win adherents.

Partnerships or contracts should not be entered into today. Strangers should not be trusted readily.

The death of a public man, who has a large following is prophesied.

Increase of mental unsoundness is strongly presaged. This may be greater among women than among men.

Persons whose birthdate it is probably will have good luck if they pursue routine affairs and avoid changes.

Children born on this day may have restless natures, but they easily win success. Boys are likely to be athletic and girls vigorous.

FOLK WE TOUCH IN PASSING

AN APPEASEMENT TO CONSCIENCE.

By JULIA CHANDLER.

(Copyright, 1916.)

The Man was restless in the uncongenial companionship of a butterfly wife, and could not hide his intolerance of her shallowness.

Until he was faithless to his marriage vows.

When he appeased his conscience by overlooking her every fault.

And The Wife said unto herself: "See how he loves me!"

The personality of The Wife reminded one of apple blossoms floating in a springtime breeze, so lovely, and dainty, and sweet was she.

Everybody said The Man was a lucky fellow to have won her hand in marriage and he was of the same opinion—for a little while.

She had been an adorable sweetheart through their affianced days, and the home they made echoed her light-hearted laughter for many a month after their nuptials.

She was for all the world like a flower, blooming in the sunshine of love; drooping and fading in the shadow, so The Man called her "Blossom," and took care that no rough winds should touch the petals of her life.

For a time his role of protector pleased him, and he told himself that it was as it should be; that the charm of woman lay in her frailty and dependence, and felt no immediate impatience that his every effort to establish anything like a camaraderie between himself and The Wife met with complete failure.

She didn't want to know about his business. It bored her. She told The Man that making a living was such a stupid thing, and she wondered how he could untangle all the problems it involved without going crazy. And as she told him she curled up, like a soft kitten, in his lap, and gave him an affectionate little twist that put a period to her silly expression of opinion.

Whereupon The Man relinquished all hope that ever The Wife would do more than flit like a brilliant butterfly from pleasure to pleasure, and became restless in his growing realization that marriage should mean to a chap a little more than shielding a woman from every passing shadow.

When The Man met The Comrade he was not staying at home enough to notice that the flower-like face of The Wife had grown wan; that her eyes followed him with an expression of anxiety, and that her spirits drooped.

He had merely grown tired of his role of protector, and craved so ardently a sympathetic companionship that when he found it in another woman he drank so thirstily at the fountain that he forgot pretty much everything but the drinking.

The Comrade's intelligence was keen; her wit quick; her sympathy understanding.

The Man's first relationship with her was purely platonic. She furnished an outlet for his pent-up interests. He could discuss a business problem with her with the assurance that her understanding and judgment would be equal to that of any man. She came half way to meet his serious touch, until the time was when The Man confided to her the incompatibility of his marriage to "Blossom."

The Comrade's sense of fairness inspired her to remind him that his failure to properly gauge The Wife's possibilities before his marriage to her was purely his own fault, and reminded him that justice demanded that "Blossom" should not be made to suffer because of her inability to live up to requirements of which she had never dreamed.

Whereupon The Man said that doubtless he had been a beast and promised to be more lenient to the shallowness of The Wife.

But he was unable to keep his vow.

The inevitable comparison between her and The Comrade added to his helplessness and irritation, and sent him more and more in pursuit of the companionship that was congenial.

When The Man and The Comrade found that their beautiful friendship had grown into something deeper they talked over the situation frankly to see what could be done.

The Comrade thought of the blamelessness of The Wife and her lips set in a straight line.

The Man remembered the frailty and dependence of the little creature he had married and tears welled his eyes as he shook his head.

And they each agreed that the only decent thing to do was to go their separate ways, even though it broke their hearts to do it.

But The Man's way was a mighty human way and led back to The Comrade. The denial of her companionship filled him with intensified restlessness in his home; an unendurable intolerance and resentment of The Wife's limitations, while her wan little face and anxious eyes so added to his irritation that he fled in veritable madness to The Comrade.

Whereupon they gave up the struggle for the thing that is right, persuading themselves that love is its own sanctification.

When The Man came again into the presence of The Wife it was without a vestige of his former manner of intolerance. With pitying eyes he saw the drooping wings of his one-time brilliant butterfly, and his heart was filled with compassion as he noted her hungry eyes and tear-stained face.

With gentleness he gathered the fragile, inconsequent creature into his arms and kissed her with so great a simulation of sincerity that her laughter rang through the house with its old-time gaiety.

And when he told her that she needed a change, and suggested a beautiful trip which he promised to take with her, she scolded herself soundly for having been such a little goose as to have ever doubted his love.

"Just his nasty old business worrying him all the time," she offered herself in explanation.

PERSONALITIES I HAVE MET. ANNA PAVLOVA.

DAZZLING white swan sailing in silver majesty across the still green waters of a lily pond—Anna Pavlova!

A butterfly—a shimmering white blossom drifting from a scented branch—a tiny speck of molten sunlight filtering through the autumn leaves—Anna Pavlova!

Anna Pavlova—the flame—the swift, singing arrow—the somber pall of a storm low-hanging over the hilltops—the wood nymph following madly in the Bacchanalian train!

All these is she—on the stage, with a velvet curtain as the chrysalis for the butterfly—Pavlova.

I will never forget my first impressions of the Russian dancers or how marvelous they seemed, expressing poetry, music, and drama in their wonderful pantomime.

Pavlova with Mordkin! They were so beautiful and so physically perfect they did not seem to belong to this corrupted age, but reminded one of the abandon of the old Greek dancers who were strong and lusty and free—like birds on the wing.

After two or three years in America, Anna Pavlova was approached by moving picture companies, eager to see her upon the screen.

"Oh, no, no!" She would shake her head and fly from them. "I am afraid of z' camera—he is too hard, too cruel!"

But at last the Universal Company's pleas were not in vain, for when I was in Chicago last year on my way from the coast to the New York studio, I met Mme. Pavlova there, preparatory to her beginning her seven reel feature, "The Dumb Girl of Portici."

It was a rainy, gloomy afternoon and gladly I accepted an invitation from Mr. and Mrs. Phillips Smalley to visit a deserted summer garden where a temporary Chicago studio had been built for the staging of some of the scenes.

Already had word been sown that stone" and Owen Moore was her leading man. I am unable to tell you when "Civilization" will appear in your town, but you should write to the producers of it, who will let you know.

W. C.—Violet Mercereau played the role you admired in "The Great Problem." I think myself that names of characters should be flashed for a longer time on the screen—no one seems to get them all.

T. V. C.—Forrest Stanley played the opposite role in "The Code of Marcia Grey," with Constance Collier as the heroine.

G. T.—Chester Barnett is still with Peerless. Alice Joyce is with Vitaphone. I cannot say what her first release will be. Antonio Moreno is with Vitaphone.

Mae S.—Your scenario written for me is something like "Sister Beatrice" by Maeterlinck, and while I can judge very little from the synopsis you sent, I think you have given the ending a very gruesome twist which will not be acceptable to producers.

R. M. D.—I receive a number of letters with no address or no signature, and I fancy that your unanswered letter was among the last. Write me again and I will make sure you have an answer.
